

These differential display interfaces are great options for applications where the display is an integral component of the product as opposed to a peripheral device to the system. This is why they are featured in smart devices, such as cellphones, laptops, and televisions, where the core application is through the display. It has become increasingly common to replace analog interfaces with digital, such as replacing a push button with a capacitive touch display. This makes these differential interfaces the new standard for display communication.